Alex Easton	Alex	Easton	RMIT	Northern Star Lismore		'Most of what llearned about writing and reporting I learned after starting work. For years after graduation I would tell people the course's strength was its internship program, which got me my cadetship. But it also gave me a grasp of news writing, interviewing, and media law I did not really appreciate until years later. It could be I forgot how green I once was, but I've seen graduates come who have never even heard of the inverted pyramid."

Previously "I valued my degree highly and still do. My most influential lecturer was Rod worked on rural (kirkpatrick, who I still remain in touch with. He seems to have taken on a role as an worked on rural (kirkpatrick, who I still remain in touch with. He seems to have taken on a role as an Australian media historian and archivist. One of the things I liked about my degree was that I didn't just study "journalism" but also public policy and systems of government, Australian history, and Australian literature. It gave me a more rounded understanding of the issues I was reporting on later, and good background. As a journalist in a rural area I have had hardly any professional development opportunities since uni – it has all been about learning from practical experience. I think a mix of both theory and practice is essential. I found my DDIAE study invaluable, but now recognise that it lacked in the area of ethics. We worked on newsgathering techniques, form and news value, and there was a good emphasis on grammar, punctuation and so on – we did a lot of subbing exercises."
