He seems to have taken on a role as an Australian media historian and archivist.  One of the things I liked about my degree was that I didn't just study "journalism" but also public policy and systems of government, Australian history, and Australian literature. It gave me a more rounded understanding of the issues I was reporting on later, and good background.  As a journalist in a rural area I have had hardly any professional development opportunities since uni – it has all been about learning from practical experience. I think a mix of both theory and practice is essential. I found my DDIAE study invaluable, but now recognise that it lacked in the area of ethics. We worked on newsgathering techniques, form and news value, and there was a good emphasis on grammar, punctuation and so on – we did a lot of subbing exercises."

Gloria   De Jesus   ECU   WIN/Channel 9							I also had the opportunity through the Global Environmental Journalism Initiative to study foreign reporting in Helsinki and film a short documentary in Norway. The uni and independent centre for journalism within it are also very supportive of individual students and were very helpful and supportive during my Honours year when I wanted to pursue a story in the Pacific.

"Most of what I learned about writing and reporting learned after starting work. For years after graduation I would tell people the course's strength was its internship program, which got me my cadetship. But it also gave me a grasp of news writing, interviewing, and media law I did not really appreciate until years later. It could be I forgot how green I once was, but I've seen graduates come who have never even heard of the inverted pyramid." 	יישי שלי	"Thumbs up"											"Useful for making me conscious about ethics & integrity & the subtleties of objective reporting"				"For a period, j-schools were the only way to actually learn any journalism skills. In the Manager, ACT, recession of the early 90s, which saw the closure of the Herald (merged into the now ABC Local Radio Herald-Sun) and the ABC cutbacks of the mid 90s, many major media outlets were under terrible pressure. No-one was offering cadetships. We had to learn somewhere, and j-schools were it. A number of our teachers were "hard-bitten real journalists", who made us thump stories out on typewriters to strict deadlines, tore up inadequate stories in front of the class, etc Economic times got better, but most cadetships didn't reappear. So it's fine to criticise j-schools, but not from the assumption that the old ways are better option when they aren't an option any more.  I reckon I learned a lot from student media – all my practical skills came from those outlets where you could practice to your heart's content, experiment, and make quite a few mistakes. Nothing teaches a deadline like actual publication, even if only to fellow student readers/listeners/viewers. I do recall feeling disillusioned with my degree for some years, because it didn't immediately lead to a job as a journalist. But as I said, those were competitive times.  These days though I'm glad for the things I learned in class. Spelling, grammar and punctuation. The inverted triangle. Check, check and check again. And cross-check. Write it down, your memory isn't perfect. Your notebook is a legal document. A press release is not a story. This is what defamation is. Never say in a studio what you wouldn't want broadcast. The news bulletin will not wait for you to finish your last par. All delivered in an environment untarnished by influence from publication owners or advertisers. And all good messages I pass on when training new content makers now.  At RMIT we enjoyed both decent teaching and a full range of excellent student-run media on which to inflict our fledgling skills. On balance, I think we did okay."	COMMENTS
